The Persevering Spirit

The eyes corrode the mind in phases. In the mind of the beholder as a magnifier that streams outwards as facetious infinite screams. Against this, is a subversion solemn in its views against the predatory influence of angulated subversions—a persevering spirit. A background never against its foreground as a necessary coefficient against a declining regression is a statement of life, of energy, of truth, and the solemn regard for the distinctions in being and existence. Here, the eye is never estranged from being as a turn against the influence, evil, and harm of any outsider. The mind supports the leg in movement. The leg is committed to the movement. There is no external involvement to the movement.

The sequence cannot be broken There is no external force. Nature, burdened with the necessity of distinctions and becoming, ensures survival. Nature, in primal instigations, ensures the mind functions for the legs. But fools, corroded with the influence of beauty, corrodes their being with the impossibility of the outsider. They forget who they are to propose what is beyond them. Here, they lose their way to some unnatural multiverse, the persistent possibilities of more and better perpetually insatiable for them—escaping them escaping themselves. Like some unnatural technological multiverse, they're persistently broken in multivariate forms. If they are not broken after all, they can't be fixed. Their actions befall their thoughts. Their thoughts must undermine their actions in an unnatural world. They are constantly reacting—persistently effect.

The natural world works on action and reaction, cause and effect. Actions speak louder than words to an insane mind predatorial in a natural-time-limiting short spanned domain. His thoughts are unproductive. It is in sanity that you find a pattern of thoughts eventual in their actions. Their actions incurs the need for brokenness which they ignorantly and erroneously deem applicable to nature. Some people are committed to brokenness. For whatever senseless reasons they have sought to commit it as life—its optimization, to progress.

There is wisdom in the Christian saying that the meek shall inherit the earth because the meek are especially hard to find, especially among them. What is arrogant in spirituality while unchanging in the humble cottages of natural time and natural inspiration cannot know true graces. To sacrifice for greater causes beyond the merely material, and to be terrorized and persecuted for the same, must be divine. For the divine cannot be broken. Nature can be persecuted. She can be terrorized. She can be abused. She can be burnt to the ground and drowned. She will remain persistent, reformative and antidotal. She cannot be broken, cannot be reformed with external graces. And must be aligned for reformations with eternal graces. She cannot be merely human.

The broken shall have all their parts in their brokenness as abusers know their afflictions internally and terrorists carry their harm beyond their control. Those who steal life, labor, liberty because of their lacks shall carry their thefts in their sense of worth. All the luxuries in the world shall not assuage their pain. There is an autopsy for the broken, undetached from their pretended selves.

If nature was broken, it would have no resurgence—as their great ignorance in the greatness of their sciences must foretell. Nature could not harbor life, or know the deep-seated meaning of love. The seasons will never survive their extreme plights—they, at the mercy of their existential peril, some impossible world away.

Those with true courageous hearts would forsake their hopes to seek the pleasures against their plight. Life, love, serenity, will be easily bought, easily gotten as it is in materiality against the ceaseless perseverance of spirituality and nature.
